U.S. Army Corps of Engineers actively managing Cumberland Basin reservoirs for power generation

In response to an extreme cold forecast, coupled with the recent dry conditions, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers Nashville District is actively managing several lakes across the Cumberland River Basin to meet increasing regional power demands. The heavy hydropower generation will cause some notable changes in lake elevations over the next week.

"Lowering lake levels during the cold months is a normal part of our annual operations," explained Robert Dillingham, water manager for the Nashville District. "However, the current extreme cold forecast requires us to increase our hydropower generation, which means the public will see lake elevations drop slightly below normal. These operations will necessitate atypical water releases and fluctuations over the next several days."

USACE urges the public, especially marina operators and boat and dock owners, to be aware of the changing conditions and to take necessary precautions to protect their property.

The following projections are subject to change based on weather and power demands:

Lake Cumberland (Wolf Creek Dam): The lake will be lowered by approximately 1.5 feet over the next five days to an elevation near 687.0 feet.

Dale Hollow Lake: A drop of approximately one foot is expected over the next five days, to an elevation near 636.0 feet.

No unusual fluctuations are occurring at Cheatham and Barkley reservoirs. "We have been working closely with our hydropower partners to ensure the most efficient delivery of clean, renewable hydropower to the region's energy needs during this period of extreme cold," said Dillingham "As always, please use caution near dams, as the release schedule is subject to change without notice."

Nashville District water managers do not anticipate the current dry weather pattern to continue into 2026.

However, if these dry conditions persist, the public could see even lower lake elevations.

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers Nashville District manages the Cumberland River and its 10 tributary reservoirs to provide a wide array of public benefits, including flood risk management, navigation, hydropower, water supply, and environmental stewardship.
