playing right out of the gate, so we're focused on helping them get used to the format and pressure of high school tournaments."

Yanke credits school leadership, especially Collins Athletic Director Amanda Tucker, for making the transition easier and providing key support behind the scenes.

"Ms. Tucker's been fantastic," he said. "She's been looking out for me—setting up purchase orders for team shirts, reminding me of things I might overlook as a new coach. She's really had my back from day one."

Looking ahead, Yanke says the team's home tournament on June 26 at Shelbyville Country Club will be a highlight of the summer. The boys will compete in the morning, followed by the girls in the afternoon—a full day of golf and community.

"It's shaping up to be a big day," Yanke said. "We're already figuring out how to handle parking and crowd flow. We might shuttle from the middle school. But it'll be a great chance for folks to come out and support both teams."

As for what he wants the Collins community to know? "I'm just happy to help and to be part of something special," Yanke said. "I'm learning as I go, but I've got a great support system. These girls are fantastic, and I'm excited to help them grow—not just as golfers, but as teammates."

From high school sidelines in Shelby County to the infield at Churchill Downs and the bright lights of professional wrestling arenas, former Sentinel-News staffer Derek Brightwell has taken an unpredictable—but inspiring—path from reporter to respected photographer.

Brightwell, who once helmed the Sentinel's sports section, now works for WAVE in Louisville, where he's carved out a unique niche covering everything from the Kentucky Derby to University of North Carolina basketball and pro wrestling shows. His success, he says, is rooted in his time at the Sentinel.

"It's immeasurable how much the Sentinel helped me," Brightwell said. "I learned so much under [former editor] Todd Martin's tutelage. He gave me the kind of freedom that let me grow creatively but knew when to reel me in."

Brightwell reflected on the community he covered with pride and gratitude. "The people in Shelby County are incredible. The kids, the coaches, the fans—they gave me so much more than they ever took. I owe a lot to that time."

Although Brightwell went to school intending to be a sports writer, the job soon demanded a different skill: photography. "When I got my first newspaper job in 2019, they handed me a camera I had no clue how to use. I didn't even know how to reattach a lens after I dropped it," he said, laughing.

But he learned. Thanks in large part to sideline mentorship from local photographer Robert Gazaway, Brightwell's passion and skill behind the lens blossomed. "Robert took me under his wing for no reason other than kindness, and I still credit him for most of what I know about photography."

Eventually, Brightwell found himself drawn more to moments than mandates—capturing shots not for page layout, but for their emotional pull. "At some point, I stopped taking pictures for the paper and started taking them because I liked the way they looked. That's when I knew this was more than just part of the job."

That shift in mindset led

Brightwell to a slew of surreal opportunities: photographing the Kentucky Derby ("Every shot is beautiful—horses are just incredible to shoot"), covering his beloved UNC basketball team, snapping photos of Mookie Betts bowling in Louisville, and capturing legends like Mick Foley and Jeff Hardy at pro wrestling events.

"I've had moments where I just stop and think, 'How am I even here?'" Brightwell said. "But I always try to take advantage of the moment."

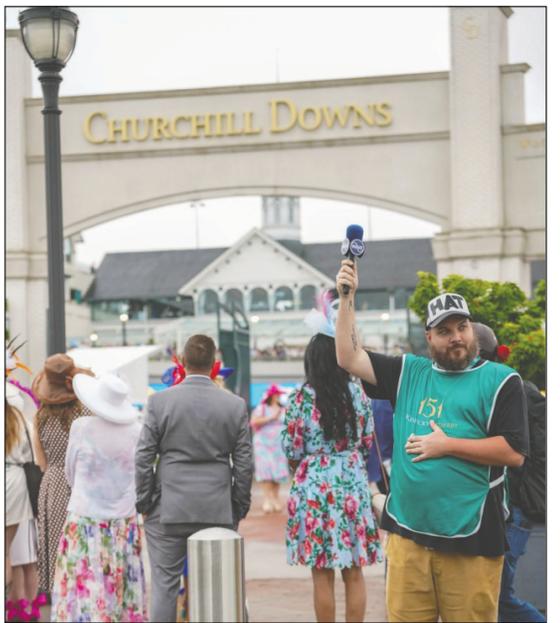

His advice for aspiring creatives? Just ask.

"Don't be afraid to ask to be part of something. Most of the events I've shot were because I reached out and asked. The worst thing they can say is no—and more often than not, they say yes."

As for what's next, Brightwell is keeping things open-ended—just the way he likes it. "I don't think about the future that much, honestly," he said. "I just want to keep doing cool things, finding myself in places I don't feel like I belong... until I finally do."

One of his goals? To get published in Pro Wrestling Illustrated. But for now, he's enjoying the journey, one frame at a time.

"I had goals in high school that I missed, and I think I'm better off because of it," Brightwell said. "If there's one thing I've learned, it's that sometimes the best path is the one you never planned."

Collins High School anglers Nate Bruce, Preston Doerr, and Nick Spry display their catches during a tournament this season. Bruce competed solo while Doerr and Spry teamed up to represent Collins' two entries in the 2025 bass fishing circuit. Both teams advanced to regionals and the KBN State Championship.

regionals."

In total, all nine boats across both Collins and Shelby County—including the junior squads—qualified for the Kentucky Bass Nation (KBN) Championship round, marking a strong finish to the season.

Among the year's many highlights, Parrett pointed to a few memorable moments, including a first-place finish at the Boyle County KBN Trail by junior team members Hunter Thompson and Carter Hurt.

"Seeing those kids up on the podium, getting that win—it's what makes it all worth it," Parrett said. "Easton Parrett and Harlan Tipton also landed a big fish that earned them a plaque. Watching their faces light up when they see their names on the leaderboard never gets old."

The thrill of fishing, Parrett noted, often comes down to one critical catch.

"There have been plenty of tournaments where one fish—caught in the final minutes—completely turned around the team's day and standings," he said. "That one fish can mean a swing of over 200 points in the rankings."

Bass fishing tournaments typically award points based on a team's total weight from up to five fish. With four events per trail, consistency and resilience are key—traits Parrett saw develop across both programs.

"The growth I've seen is incredible," he said. "From casting technique to bait selection based on weather and water conditions, these kids have made major strides."

As for the future, Parrett is excited to welcome new anglers when the season restarts in August, but he emphasized one crucial need: boat captains.

"The number one hurdle we face is finding adults with boats who are willing to volunteer their weekends," he said. "We can only take as many kids fishing as we have boat captains. Anyone interested in supporting the team would be making a huge difference."

For now, Parrett is just proud of how far his student anglers have come.

"They've grown not just as competitors, but as teammates and friends," he said. "It's been one of the most rewarding seasons I've had."
