Greensburg Record-Herald reader Stanley Riddle turned 85 years young last Sunday, July 12. Mr. Riddle celebrated his special day with his wife, Janice, and a cake adorned with strawberries.

Business Firms To CLOSE
EACH THURSDAY

Too hot to work

In a fast paced world where many businesses offer 24/7 service, it seems odd to think of one cutting their hours of operation, yet some residents of Green County will remember when, not so long ago, many of Greensburg's businesses closed each Thursday. The tradition that lasted more than six decades began in the late 1930s, when businesses across town routinely shut their doors on Thursday afternoons to create a weekly half holiday that shaped local commerce and community life.

The earliest notices appear in the Record Herald in July 1937, when merchants agreed to close at 1 p.m. each Thursday to give the employers and employees a half-day holiday during the hot summer months. Stores such as Monson's Department Store, Dulworth's Bargain Store, Woodson Lewis, and G. O. Burress & Co. were among the first to participate.

By the late 1930s and early 1940s, the practice had expanded. Beauty shops announced Thursday afternoon closings in 1939 and 1940, and by August 1940 even the banks joined in, remaining open only on Thursday mornings while merchants took their weekly break. In 1942, the majority of stores, banks, and restaurants were closing each Thursday afternoon, with only drug stores and the Record-Herald staying open "for all the business they can get."

The tradition continued into the postwar years. Long lists of participating businesses filled the newspaper including groceries, hardware stores, shoe shops, barber shops, dry cleaners, and more. Even the Greensburg Post Office joined the closing at noon on Thursdays to reduce operating expenses.

By 1949, Thursday closings had expanded from half days to full days. Many businesses began to keep that schedule throughout the year, not just during summer months.

The closings had become so routine that hardware stores experimented with rotating schedules so customers could still find supplies. Banks maintained Thursday closures through the 1950s and 1960s, observing the day weekly except when a legal holiday fell within the same week. Medical offices, including Dr. Robert L. Shuffett's and Dr. Phillip Shaw's chiropractic office, adopted the Thursday break as well.

The practice extended beyond private business. The Green County Court Clerk's office and the courthouse itself were routinely closed on Thursdays, a schedule that lasted well into the 2000s.

Though the tradition has faded, for many decades Thursday closings offered merchants a predictable break, employees a chance to breathe, and the community a shared pace that shaped business dealings, doctor visits, and weekly errands.
