COMMENTARY

Can't even say her name? Angel City handled Thompson transfer in odd way.

BY KEVIN BAXTER
Los Angeles Times, The Tribune Content Agency

HARRY HOW TNS

Alyssa Thompson of Angel City FC laughs after her goal during a 2-1 win over the Chicago Red Stars at BMO Stadium on Sept. 1, 2024, in Los Angeles.

LOS ANGELES

It was a moment that should have been celebrated on both sides of the Atlantic. What could prove to be the most expensive transfer in women's soccer history - and already is the largest outgoing transfer in NWSL history - had sent Alyssa Thompson from Angel City and the NWSL to Chelsea of England's Women's Super League.

It was a monumental deal, one that could come to define Thompson's career and help repair Angel City's brand as a rich club that has mostly bumbled its way through its first four seasons.

It was a massive win for the player and both clubs.

Yet before the ink on the agreement had dried Angel City was already tarnishing what it should have been cheering. Coach Alexander Straus refused to even say Thompson's name, opening a conference call with reporters Thursday by insisting he would not answer questions about "a certain player" or "a certain transfer."

It was the second time in four days Straus refused to acknowledge his team's best player.

Thompson, of course, has never been "a certain player" or "a certain transfer." She's a player Angel City moved heaven and earth to draft and sign in 2023, giving her a contract worth an estimated $1 million, then one of the richest in the NWSL. She's a player who went on to become the club's all-time leader in goals and rank sixth in appearances.

The least the coach could do is say her name.

Then three hours after that conference call, and about an hour after Thompson's transfer became official, the club muddled things even further by reaching out to anyone who would listen to say it had done everything it could to keep Thompson, who had professed her desire to stay with Angel City when she signed a long-term contract extension just nine months earlier.

Thompson has the right to change her mind when a better opportunity comes along, of course, and Chelsea offered exactly that. Just 20, Thompson has already proven to be one of the most dynamic players in the world but she hasn't come close to realizing her full potential and it's unlikely she would have stayed in the NWSL.

The transfer was necessary for Thompson to find out how good she can be. And just as important is the fact that Thompson, who lived with her parents for the first year of her professional career, will now be on her own for the first time. How she adapts will no doubt have a major influence on her career as well.

But the club's admission it did everything it could to keep her - a message aimed at fans angry at seeing the team's best player go - simply confirmed what many in Thompson's camp had thought since Chelsea first approached Angel City with a transfer offer last month: the club was more interested in blocking the deal than facilitating it.

"She wants to go to Chelsea and made it very clear," a Thompson confidant said late in the process. "ACFC has to respect her."

For the club to suggest it had tried to hold up the transfer was the exact wrong message to send and one that - along with Straus' lack of respect - won't soon be forgotten by ambitious young players Angel City may approach in the future.

Thompson was one of eight players on the Angel City roster aged 20 or younger. Many, if not all, of those young women must be confident the club won't stand in their way if they have a chance to move on and develop their talent on a bigger stage.

That's the way soccer works. It's why clubs allow players to leave in the middle of a season to play for their national teams despite the risk of injury. It's unfortunate the transfer happened now, hampering Angel City's final push for a playoff berth. But as long as the NWSL plays on a different calendar from the rest of the world, the transfer windows will always be awkward.

Yes, Angel City should - and it did - fight hard for every last penny in the transfer talks. The team recruited Thompson, signed her, paid her good money and gave her an opportunity and a platform to play both professionally and in a World Cup.

By all accounts, the team was masterful in its negotiations with Chelsea and it was rewarded with a record-breaking transfer fee. They deserve a huge pat on the back for that.

Just which records the deal broke depends on how you look at it. Multiple sources involved in the talks confirmed the transfer's value at $1.65 million, which would make it the most expensive transfer in women's soccer history.

Yet that's not what Angel City deposited in the bank last week. Whether Chelsea will pay the full amount will be determined by non-disclosed escalators, mainly based on Thompson's performance, that were included in the deal. For the time being, however, Angel City will have to get by with about half a million less, putting the initial value of the transfer somewhere between the nearly $1.1 million Chelsea paid the San Diego Wave last January for defender Naomi Girma and the $1.5 million the Orlando Pride paid Mexico's Tigres for Lizbeth Ovalle last month.

Either way it's the largest fee for an outgoing player in NWSL history and probably enough for Angel City to keep the lights on. So on Friday morning the club sent out a tepid three-paragraph statement announcing a transfer everyone else knew was done.

"We thank Alyssa for her contributions to Angel City and are grateful for the mark she has left on our team and the city of Los Angeles," it read.

At least they said her name.
