catcher/right-fielder. He has appeared in 46 games and is batting .198.

Talking about Forbes prior to the Cards' trip to the College World Series last month, McDonnell said the 6-3, 220-pounder has the physical tools and the mental ability to succeed on the major league level.

"The world of pitching is you've got to pitch out of jams. Yeah, you might get an inning or two where the ball gets hit right at people, three up, three down. But baseball's not supposed to be easy. You've got to pitch out of the stretch, you've got to control the running game, you've got to make pitches with runners in scoring position.

"And that's where someone like Patrick, who's a great athlete, a two-way player who hasn't pitched a whole lot, excels. Yeah, he's been on the mound, but he hasn't been in enough of those situations. I thought this was going to be a huge growth year for him, and this last month he's pitched out of the stretch, out of jams, not let it snowball on him. That's what pitching is. His best days are ahead of him. Pro ball knows that because of how fresh he is, his body, his arm, his mindset. Some organization is going to get a future super star and it's going to be fun to watch his career."

Forbes, who missed three weeks of the season with a hip injury, finished with a modest 4-2 record and a 4.42 ERA, but he came on strong during Louisville's post-season run. For the year, he struck out 117 batters in 71 1/3 innings to lead the ACC in strikeouts per nine innings at 14.76, which was third nationally.

Forbes was a shortstop/pitcher at Bowling Green High School, where he was named 2022 Mr. Baseball by the Kentucky High School Baseball Coaches Association.

At U of L, he was an outfielder as a freshman, hitting .258 in 93 at-bats. Moving into a full-time pitching role as a sophomore, he logged 29 innings across 12 appearances. This season he struck out 11 on opening night against No. 7 Texas and notched a career-best 13 against Cal, and again vs. East Tennessee State in the opening round of the Nashville Regional.

Forbes' fast ball averaged 94-96 mph, sometimes hitting 100. According to MLBanalysis.com, pro scouts not only like his velocity but view his slider as a plus pitch with good break and believe his changeup also shows promise.

Reed mentioned as possible candidate for US House

BY JACK BRAMMER
PAXTON MEDIA GROUP

SHELBYVILLE -- Republican state Sen. Aaron Reed of Shelbyville is being mum about a news report that he is being considered to be a candidate next year for the U.S. House seat now held by Republican Thomas Massie.

Reed, who was elected to the Kentucky Senate last year, did not return phone calls from Paxton Media seeking comment about a June 29 article in Politico, a political journalism organization based in Arlington County, Virginia, that said White House officials will host Reed in the coming weeks for a discussion about challenging Massie in the 2026 Republican primary election.

Reed, a former Navy SEAL who often wears a large cowboy hat, could run for Congress next year and keep his state legislative seat. If he won the congressional seat, he would have to leave the state post. A special election then would be held to fill the remainder of his legislative term, which runs through 2029.

Shelby County farmer and former Navy SEAL Ed Gallrein lost to Reed in last year's Republican election by 118 votes.

Asked this week if he would be interested in seeking the state Senate seat again if it reopens, Gallrein said, "It would be an honor and privilege to serve the people of this Senate district in Frankfort to continue my service both as a fifth generation Kentucky farmer and a career active duty senior Navy SEAL officer and now a senior advisor for Special Operations."

Democrat Rhonda Davis, whom Reed handily defeated – 40,538 to 19,112 – in last November's general election, did not return a phone call seeking comment.

Shelby County farmer Paul Hornback, a Republican who served in the state Senate for 12 years for Shelby County, said this week he has "no interest" in trying to return to the state legislature.

"I've always been for term limits and I think 12 years were enough," said Hornback, who noted that he has never been a supporter of Reed.

Reed represents the Senate's 7th District, made up of Shelby, Henry, Anderson and part of Jefferson County. It is about 50.4 percent Republican in voter registration.

Reed and Massie have had an interesting political relationship. Massie previously had endorsed Massie for state Senate and Reed once called Massie "one of American's greatest Congressmen."

But President Trump and his political operation have threatened to field a candidate against Massie and campaign "really hard" against him because Massie was one of the few Republicans to vote against Trump's "big, beautiful" budget bill and Massie opposed the president's Iran-Israel stance. Massie said Trump's threats led to his campaign taking in $120,000 in a single day.

Politico reported that Trump political advisers Chris LaCivita and pollster Tony Fabrizio have launched a super PAC directed at defeating Massie that's already running a TV ad attacking the seven-term incumbent.

perspective on the crime or the victim, revelations will bubble to the surface about what really went wrong, as secrets they may have held for years or memories they may have suppressed resurface. "A Killer Among Friends" will showcase that each case may not be as simple as it seems, and ultimately reveal who may feel more complicit than they originally claimed.

In the season premiere episode, "Killer on Campus" airing Monday, July 14 at 10 p.m., Trent DiGiuro, a University of Kentucky football player, is shot and killed while celebrating his 21st birthday with his college buddies. Even though there are many witnesses, no one can identify the killer. Investigators question everyone in DiGiuro's inner circle, but no one can think of a single person who would want to hurt the popular athlete. As the campus reels from the tragedy, Trent's friends fear that the killer was actually targeting one of them and worry that they will come back to finish the job.
