Worrying has always been around

Are you one of those people who can always find something to worry about? Don't be alarmed, you are not alone. We all worry, and we all worry a lot. Some of us just handle the worrying better than others.

Worrying is in our DNA. There is a reason why we're wired to focus on the negative, and it all started about two hundred to three hundred thousand years ago. When Paleolithic man was moving around the earth and hunting and gathering for a living, he faced a lot of threats. Survival hinged on vigilance. Early humans lived in an unpredictable world where predators, food scarcity, and environmental threats were constant. If they were walking down to the creek to get a drink of water and heard a tiger rustling about nearby, they had better concentrate on the tiger and not the beautiful sunset or how thirsty they were.

Those who reacted swiftly to threats and worried about what was to come next were more likely to survive and pass on their genes of vigilance. This survival-based wiring is still embedded in our DNA today. Without his absolute attentiveness to the ever-present threats, early men and women would not survive to pass along the genes of "worry" to their offspring. Those that didn't worry didn't survive.

Modern humans no longer face saber-toothed cats, daily hunts for sustenance, or trying to figure out which foods are poisons and which aren't. But this process became incredibly powerful in making us who we are today. Our brains still scan for threats. We are not designed for constant contentment. This is why it seems that bad news grabs our attention more than good, and why uncertainty feels so uncomfortable.

Of course, we have to make countless decisions today. Is the weather right to mow the hay, should I buy a better car now, should I tell my boss about that? Things like that come up every day. It is the "worry" that leads us to make the right decisions.

The ancient worries of Paleolithic humans are still with us, encoded in our nervous systems. They once served to keep us alive, but in a world of information overload and modern complexity, the worrying that precedes our decisions often cause undue distress. Understanding this evolutionary inheritance can surely help us to deal with all of the stuff that flies around today. It seems like the best thing we can do to stop the worrying is to dedicate ourselves to check out all available information, make the decision, and then move on.

This is all fine and good, but now I'm worrying about how to stop worrying!
