where one is traveling from (walking in Bible times) the trek is up hill; thus "up to Jerusalem."

We must also consider the Bible reference to "the world." Their world was less in area than the eastern part of the U.S.

Matthew 24: 9 "Then shall they deliver you up to be afflicted, and shall kill you: and ye shall be hated of all nations for my name's sake."

"All nations" would have been different from today. Whereas there are 195 countries in the world today, how many nations were there in 33 AD? We could probably come up with a close number but with over 2000 years passed, the history of nations could easily have been convoluted.

We continually try to make the Bible fit into our current day conditions of speech, geographic, social and economic conditions.

At times, considering the differences in usages (then and now), the meaning we glean from our Bible studies can completely change. Most Christians believe the Holy Bible was written by forty men over a period of 1600 years, and their inspiration came from God.

Since such an opinion may be true, we still should consider the time factor involved. The knowledge of the planet earth possessed by those forty writers and the interpreting in the King James Bible (Published 1611) and those compiling other versions was limited.

Understanding these and other considerations are open for opinions, it becomes logical to regard the differences in time and space.

Personally I have to think that if God inspired the writing of the Holy Bible, He would possibly have inspired the translating of the numerous versions. While those were mostly composed with a "sell-the-product" motivation; whether or not God inspired them is certainly up for opinion.

The examples of changing understandings throughout the Bible are numerous. Conditions currently identified as such as epilepsy, blindness or mental illnesses were thought to be demonic possession.
