

McCuddy arrives at Boyd's Station to complete trio

BY DEVON WILLIAMS
NEWS REPORTER

The third and final piece of the 2026 Boyd’s Station puzzle has finally arrived and fallen in place.

As they have for the last seven or eight years, Boyd’s Station has extended three offers for a fellowship to young artists to document Cynthiana, Harrison County as part of the ongoing Project 306.36 visual archive.

Member number three is photographer Maddie McCuddy, a graduate from the University of Montana who has travelled east to help use what she’s learned in journalism to document life in Harrison County. As a winner of the fellowship she has received the $3,000 Ed Reinke visual storytelling grant.

A friend to McCuddy and former participant of the fellowship, John Stember, encouraged her to pursue the opportunity and flex her journalistic muscles.

“I grew up in a pretty rural town in south Washington and this reminds me a lot of it,” noted

McCuddy on the change in scenery. “I feel like a lot of rural towns have a lot of overlap in America.”

Kentucky might not have the mountain ranges of the western United States, or the cowboys, but it has the charm of small-town life like any old town in the country.

“I think that small communities offer quieter moments,” reflected McCuddy. “And I feel like it shows a slower method of life that people often people don't see, and, there's a lot to uncover in small communities. I think that it's very ordinary to some people but also very non-ordinary to others.”

With the archival project, artists have documented the life of the Maiden City and its changes over the last several years. Each artist finds an area of life and narrows in. For McCuddy, it’s the small moments that have caught her attention.

“I wouldn't say I'm uncovering anything, I think that I'm just trying to document as much everyday life as I can, 'cause it's an archive project and it is a lot of just observing the quiet,” noted McCuddy. “I feel like I'm a quieter photographer — I like the peaceful moments and not the action. Like if you're at an event or something, I like the sidelines, you know?”

It's only been a few weeks in the field for McCuddy, while her counterparts, Lylee Gibbs (Tim Dillon Visual Storytelling Grant recipient) and Nikole Valiente (Mary Withers Rural Writing Fellow) have been here since May. In the short time since arriving, McCuddy has travelled the windy country roads and explored the lay of the land.

Down the road, McCuddy has interest of expanding on her photojournalistic pursuits. “I want to do longer form storytelling, documentary photography. And I'd love to travel all over the world, but I don't know what I'm gonna do right after this. I might go to New York and bounce around there and try to freelance for a little while, but long term, I just, I want to be in a space where I can do project-based work.”

But for the coming weeks, McCuddy will stay put in Cynthiana and attempt to capture how rural America has and is changing over time.

“People are older,” McCuddy noted on the archive. “It's just cool to see people aging, you know? And businesses, obviously, closed down and change, and I feel like I've noticed a lot of places are not there anymore, like bars.

"But I think the thing that is the coolest to me is just watching people age over time. Often, you don't get to see that; you don't get to see people in their everyday life go from four years old to 12 years old, you know, and every single summer be documented in the same place."
